

Hi Tom,

Here's my WOTM testimony...

I have been a Christian since I was a child. The people that I associate with know that and they would always come to me if they had questions about Christianity. In the office, I wouldn't openly share my faith partly because I was never convicted to do that, and partly because being the manager, I didn't feel it was appropriate for me to do that. But people would talk to me about things privately and I was open about my faith. One day a friend and co-worker came to me and told me that she had been "saved."

I told her I thought that was great. But she was confused because she said I didn't seem really excited. I felt bad and I told her I knew that I should be excited, but that I had seen a lot of people "get saved" but then eventually go back to their old ways. I told her I didn't know why, but that it happens a lot. I have lost touch with her now, and I sure wish I could find her again. Because now I know exactly why that happens, and I sure wish I could tell her...

The first time I caught a glimpse of The Way of the Master on TV while channel flipping, I was in awe of this elegant and beautiful concept. I hadn't heard this kind of pure truth in church for a long, long, time. What struck me the most, is that the people Kirk and Ray were talking to didn't know about Jesus and what he did. I couldn't believe that people living in America actually didn't know stuff I had been taught since early childhood. Of course this convicted me to start sharing my faith more, passing out tracts, and learning what to say.

I started reading some of Ray Comfort's books and became a huge fan. My favorite book was "Out of the Comfort Zone." My friend and I bought a case of those and gave them away for Christmas gifts. I really got excited when The Way of the Master Radio came on the air in January. I listen everyday while working in my cubicle. Getting that for 2 hours a day really has boosted my abilities to "swing from the natural to the spiritual" because lots of stuff in everyday conversation reminds me of things I heard on the radio.

In May, I was fortunate enough to go to New York with one of the Boot Camps. That was an awesome experience and I am changed forever. (I won't go into a detail, because I know that would take too long...I have a 15 page document that I made detailing that trip, I can email it if anyone is interested in reading it).

This summer, my family went with my good friend (and fellow WOTM fan) and her family to Huntington beach to go boogie boarding and catch a little bit of Ray Comfort's speaking. She was very happy to get to meet him.

It is really great to have a close friend who is as big of a WOTM fan as I am because it is very disheartening that more of my "Christian" friends don't share our enthusiasm. I can't understand it, but I think they call it "club frustration." I will continue to pray for my pastor and the elders to open their eyes.
